PREFACE

Rarely will a science be found in a position so anomalous as that of medieval studies, wanting as they do an indispensable tool, a modern, practical dictionary of the language in which the large majority of the documents are written. The old DU CANGE, in the rather unwieldy shape it has taken in the editions by HENSCHEL and FAVRE, remains a valuable instrument, no doubt, but also a very awkward one. It is too prolix to provide rapid information. Its explanations, couched in humanist's Latin, are justly celebrated, but not particularly attractive. What is worse, in a great many cases it is practically impossible to check its quotations. Most of them are inevitably taken from editions now obsolete; many are lacking in bibliographical or chronological data. Moreover, today few scholars are so fortunate as to possess a copy of Du Cange. On the other hand, the "new Du Cange", planned since 1920, is still under way, and certainly nobody now past childhood will live to see its completion. For many years to come it will be a partially published work, like the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae. And again like the Thesaurus, it will be bulky and unfit for quick use. In my view we really want two different dictionaries of medieval Latin: the large-scale "new Du Cange", and besides that a compendious lexicon for rapid information. And I think it would be bad policy to postpone the lesser task until the far-off moment when the greater scheme is finally consummated. Word-lists which have been so far published as the first-fruits of the preparatory work organized by the International Academic Union, their compilers being Sign. ARNALDI for Italy and Messrs. BAXTER and JOHNSON for Great Britain and Ireland, are rendering appreciable service, but they are confined to narrow geographical and, in the case of ARNALDO, chronological limits. Their explanations are very brief. The list by BAXTER and JOHNSON does not contain any references. A survey of the entire field is badly needed. Only this can revive general interest in the study of the original sources, help to train young scholars efficiently and check the regrettable tendency which gives rise to the stream of translated material coming forth in our day. These ends can be attained only by giving up Latin as a medium of explanation and replacing it by some of the modern languages, which have developed an adequate scientific terminology.

Perhaps a lack of mutual understanding between historians and philologists lies at the root of their common failure to produce a modern Du Cange. Philology is chiefly interested in belles-lettres and especially in poetry. Now medieval Latin was not made by poets. The essential enlargement of the Latin vocabulary must be sought, not in their more or less far-fetched neologisms, but in that great body of technical words which served to denote the concepts belonging to the wide field of law and institutions, to describe the social facts referred to in charters, laws and chronicles. For this purpose, in order to express a thousand things which did not exist in the Ancient World, medieval people were obliged to create the indispensable vocabulary, partly by borrowing from vernacular languages, partly by applying words inherited from the classics in quite new ways. In these circumstances I think there is no reason to apologize for the fact that a historian, who has gained some acquaintance with charters and other documents, should have ventured on this enterprise. Several generations of historians have preceded him in the same path, by studying details of terminology in their accounts of the political, legal and social institutions of the Western World of the Middle Ages, as well as by preparing editions of authorities and documents, many of which meet the highest philological standards. The works of these illustrious scholars—professional historians who practised the craft of the philologist and practised it well—have to a great extent provided the basis for this book, not only as far as critical editions of source-material are concerned, but in the field of lexicography as well. Especially the glossaries added to a number of editions and in particular to many volumes of the Monumenta Germaniae Historica have proved of the utmost utility for my purpose. On the other hand, some standard works on institutions, like those of FUSTEL, LUCHAIRE, FLACH, WAITZ, BRUNNER and others, although getting out of date, have still much value on account of their wealth of quotations, and I have gratefully availed myself of them. Large works of reference like the Deutsches Rechtswörterbuch, the Dictionnaire d'Histoire et de Géographie Ecclésiastiques, the Dictionnaire de Droit Canonique and others have been equally serviceable. Personally I have read many thousands of charters and some hundreds of other writings. For this I of course selected the most important sources and the best modern publications. From DU CANGE-FAVRE I have taken only a number of quotations relative to words and meanings which I could not otherwise sufficiently illustrate, especially passages from charters, in so far as dates and places of origin are given. I have checked nearly all these quotations and as far as possible modernized the bibliographical data.

It is clear that a dictionary of medieval Latin can take for granted everything that belongs to the classical inheritance. But we must not forget that in fact medieval Latinity was constantly drawing upon two sources. While it again and again renewed contact with the classics, at the same time it remained intimately connected with later Latin and especially with the language of the Vulgate and the Christian Fathers. Now we cannot expect our students, who have been educated in the humanities, to have any knowledge of later Latin. Therefore I decided to incorporate the vocabulary of later Latin, in so far as it reappears in medieval writings, giving quotations only in exceptional cases, when the word or meaning in question is rare. This part of my task was comparatively easy, thanks to the excellent Glossary of Later Latin by Professor SOUTER, a very welcome addition to FORCELLINI and the Thesaurus.

A formidable problem for my scheme was the rapidly growing number of words borrowed from or modelled after the popular languages which appear from the twelfth and especially from the thirteenth century onward. As knowledge of Latin spread, regard for its purity declined. Alien elements were introduced much more freely than before. During the same period the quantity of material available to us grows immensely. From about A.D. 1150 I was unable to make my selection of quotations in any degree representative. These combined reasons have induced me to note for most of the words and meanings which appear only in the later Middle Ages simply the century and, if necessary, the region in which they occur.

So the great majority of my quotations come from the six centuries between A.D. 550 and 1150. Much care has been given to selecting early examples, so that we can ascertain when, where and how a word was adopted or a meaning developed. This kind of knowledge may provide inestimable help to the solution of critical problems, in particular those concerned with genuine and forged charters. For this reason I have taken considerable pains to furnish, in addition to the bibliographical data, short chronological and geographical indications locating the sources quoted, especially charters.

It is an open question what exactly belongs to the Latin vocabulary and what does not. I must confess that I am unable to formulate entirely satisfactory criteria for drawing a clear line between Latinized and non-Latinized barbarous words. There is a broad transitional zone. For my purpose sorting out was mainly a practical business. At any rate I feel that it would have been wrong to leave out all the passages where an author describes a word as barbarous. In truth such words often were already currently used by contemporary scribes and the notorious formula "ut vulgo dicitur" means simply that the author prides himself on writing better Latin than other people of his day.

In order to make this book as useful as possible within its limited scope all the stress has been laid on two things: explanations and quotations. The latter have been chosen chiefly in order to illustrate the meanings, not so much to show syntactic peculiarities. Syntax as well as grammatical matter has been deliberately neglected. As to etymology, I have just mentioned the language from which a word has been borrowed, or simply noted "Germ." in case of borrowing from one or more of the Germanic languages. The fact that a word is derived from another word which either belongs to the classical vocabulary or appears elsewhere in this book has been pointed out only when the derivation is not quite obvious. In some cases I have added for comparison words from the principal modern languages (French, Italian, English, German) which are related to the words treated and may help us to understand their semantic evolution.
